I. EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Arts education has long been recognized by experts around the world as having a tremendously positive influence on children and their academic attainment, social emotional development and future employment. The skills learned from arts education are more relevant today than ever, as New York City's economy is increasingly focused on industries that value creativity, innovation and problem solving.

Despite these widely-acknowledged benefits, as well as clearly established mandates in New York State Education Law requiring that students in grades 7-12 receive core arts instruction taught by certified teachers, the provision of arts education in New York City's public schools has become both inequitable and underfunded. Instruction in visual arts, music, dance and theater has been weakened by a decade of disinvestment and disincentives and a school accountability system – based on federal and state priorities – that fails to fully recognize the value of comprehensive arts education.

Figures from the New York City Department of Education's (DOE) Annual Arts in Schools Reports show a 47 percent decline in spending to hire arts and cultural organizations to provide educational services for students, and an even steeper decline in spending on arts supplies and equipment over the past seven years. While schools have had access to "supplemental arts funding" intended for arts education, many schools have opted to divert these funds to non-arts related areas.

As a result, many of the City's public schools are in violation of New York State Law, which sets minimal instruction requirements that schools must meet for the arts at each grade level, and deep disparities exist between schools at all grade levels. This report provides a first-ever school-by-school breakdown of the state of arts education in the public schools, and contextualizes the results with data on the city's economic landscape. Findings include:

- 419 schools in New York City (28 percent) lack even one full-time, certified arts teacher, including 20 percent of all high schools (76), 22 percent of all middle schools (59) and 38 percent of all elementary schools (232);
- 306 schools (20 percent) have neither a full- nor a part-time certified arts teacher, including 14 percent of all high schools (53), 13 percent of all middle schools (34) and 30 percent of all elementary schools (182); and
- 16 percent of schools have no arts or cultural partnerships and 10 percent of schools have no dedicated arts room.

Furthermore, it is clear that reductions in arts education have fallen disproportionately on the City's lower income neighborhoods, especially the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn. While these two neighborhoods are home to just 31 percent of all City schools, this report found that:

- More than 42 percent of schools that lack either full-time or part-time certified arts teachers are located in the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn; and
- Nearly half of the schools that lack both a certified arts teacher and an arts or cultural partnership are located in the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn.

With new leadership at the New York City Department of Education, now is an ideal time to identify challenges that exist to meeting State arts mandates and expanding arts education to all City neighborhoods, and offer recommendations for achieving these goals. In the cultural capital of the world, arts education and the opportunities it provides must be equally accessible to all.

The report makes the following recommendations:

- Broaden the DOE accountability framework, including School Progress Reports, to include arts education. As part of a larger review of School Progress Reports, the DOE should include information in every school profile about certified arts teachers, partnerships with arts and cultural organizations, dedicated arts rooms and compliance with State mandates in arts instruction.
- Promote strategies that build schools' capacity to have at least one certified arts teacher on staff. Every elementary, middle and high school should have at least one certified arts teacher, and more where appropriate. DOE should work with schools serving grades 7-12 to comply with State mandates for certified arts teachers. Where feasible, small schools should be encouraged to share arts teachers.
- Build schools' capacity to provide a robust arts education by expanding outreach to potential cultural partners. The DOE should provide additional supports to schools lacking cultural partnerships, including helping to connect and pair them with arts and cultural organizations. The DOE currently hosts one "Cultural Fair" each year to encourage arts and cultural organizations to partner with city schools. This outreach should be expanded to include similar fairs in all five boroughs at least once a year.
- Adopt a "no-net loss" of space policy as part of a larger effort to increase arts rooms and to ensure that every school has places equipped for the arts. Although finding or creating new space for dedicated arts rooms in New York City will always be a challenge, the DOE should ensure that there is "no-net loss" of arts rooms when district schools are co-located with other district or charter schools. DOE's Educational Impact Statements (EIS) should clearly specify how DOE will preserve existing dedicated arts rooms. Further, future school planning and construction should include dedicated arts spaces.
- Ensure adequate funding to support quality arts education at all city schools. The DOE should prioritize supports for arts education in schools that have yet to meet at least the minimum standards set by the City and State, and break out arts spending in its budget so the public can see how much is being spent on a school-by-school basis.

In the end, providing every child in New York City with a robust arts education should be more than an aspiration. It should be viewed as an essential component of a 21st century curriculum – one that all our students should have the opportunity to enjoy.

II. INTRODUCTION

Arts education has long been recognized by academics, teachers and parents for its positive impact on students inside and outside the classroom. In a 2012 analysis of longitudinal research on the relationship between arts engagement and students' academic and social outcomes, the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) found that youth of low socioeconomic status with a history of high arts engagement¹ had better grades and higher college enrollment and attainment rates than youth without such involvement.² In addition, the NEA found that high school students who had in-depth arts engagement:

- Had higher GPAs than students with low levels of arts engagement;
- Enrolled at higher rates in competitive and four-year colleges than low-arts-engaged students; and
- Were three times more likely than their arts-poor peers to earn a bachelor's degree.

Despite the documented importance of arts education in schools, clear mandates for arts instruction in State Education Law³ and New York City's status as one of the foremost cultural centers of the world, the City's public school system continues to confront challenges providing all of its 1.1 million students with equitable access to a robust education in the arts.⁴

Data from New York City Department of Education's Annual Arts in Schools Reports indicate a significant decrease in spending for the arts over the past seven years.⁵ In School Year (SY) 2006-2007, schools spent $25.7 million to hire arts and cultural organizations to provide educational services for students, compared to $13.6 million in SY 2012-2013 – a 47 percent decline. Additionally, in SY 2006-2007, schools spent $10.7 million on arts supplies and equipment, compared to $1.7 million in SY 2012-2013 – an 84 percent decline. While principals have had access to “supplemental arts funding”⁶ that is intended to be used for arts education, many have opted to divert these funds to non-arts related areas.

This report provides New Yorkers with a school-by-school breakdown of the state of arts education in our public schools, based on the most recent arts data provided by the New York City Department of Education in its individual Annual Arts in Schools Reports for 2012-2013.⁷ The Office of New York City Comptroller Scott Stringer analyzed information provided by principals at 1,487 schools across the five boroughs in response to the DOE's 2012-2013 Arts Education Survey.⁸ The Survey provides data on the state of arts education in public schools, including student participation, teachers assigned to teach the arts, arts and cultural partnerships and space.⁹

The Comptroller's Office analyzed data in three areas that shed light on a school's capacity to deliver arts services and programming to its students:

1. Whether schools employ full-time and/or part-time certified arts teachers;
2. Whether schools have formal partnerships with arts and cultural organizations; and
3. Whether schools dedicate rooms solely for instruction in core arts areas, including the visual arts, music, theater and dance.

The data were mapped to determine geographic patterns, then compared with economic data for further analysis. These maps – set against a backdrop of median income level by U.S. Census tract – reveal deep inequities in arts opportunities. Students attending schools in parts of the city that have historically experienced significant economic challenges – including the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn – have disproportionately poorer access to arts resources than those in more affluent areas.¹⁰ Although schools in the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn represent only 31 percent of all City schools, more than 42 percent of schools that lack either full-time or part-time certified art teachers are located in these neighborhoods.

1 “High arts engagement” is defined on page 9 of the NEA report:

III. THE HISTORY OF ARTS EDUCATION IN THE NYC PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM

This report proceeds in three parts. First, in order to understand the current plight of arts education in City schools, it is essential to understand the complex history of arts education. Over the past 40 years, New York City has confronted a range of challenges, from fiscal crises and budget cuts, to rigid accountability measures and shifting educational priorities, all of which have contributed to inadequate provision of arts education in the public schools.

Next, the report summarizes the findings culled from the DOE’s data sets, with a focus on certified arts teacher staffing levels, partnerships with arts and cultural organizations and dedicated arts space in our schools, all key elements that reflect a school’s commitment to the arts.

Lastly, the report offers recommendations on how to ensure that all City schools have the resources necessary for students to access high quality, creative arts programming – programming that acknowledges that the State’s mandates are a floor and not a ceiling for what can be accomplished in the cultural capital of the world.

Since the fiscal crisis of the 1970s, New York City public schools have faced a series of challenges in their effort to provide students with comprehensive arts education. From budget cuts and shifting educational priorities to the space limitations that come with inhabiting one of the densest urban centers in the nation, New York City has long struggled to bring the promise of arts education to every school in every neighborhood.

According to a 2003 New York City Council report, arts education has historically been one of the first areas targeted for cuts when the city has experienced periods of economic distress.¹¹

In the 1970s, funding cuts had a devastating effect on schools’ ability to provide students with basic courses in core arts areas, including the visual arts, music, dance and theater. At the same time, arts teachers were laid off, schools converted dedicated arts rooms into classrooms and training programs for higher education arts instructors – with nowhere to send their graduates – all but disappeared.¹²

Over the next twenty years, New York City’s artistic and cultural institutions did their best to fill this void.¹³ However, it was not until the late 1990s that a more systematic approach to providing arts education in the public schools emerged – the result of an influx of grant funding targeted for the expansion of arts education, the establishment of The Center for Arts Education (CAE) and the creation of a dedicated fund for arts in the public schools called Project ARTS.

In 1995, New York City was awarded $21.5 million to develop a comprehensive and coordinated network of “customized partnerships” between cultural institutions and schools, as part of the Walter H. Annenberg Foundation’s “Annenberg

¹⁰ While current findings are relatively consistent with previous years’ data from the DOE’s Annual Arts in Schools Reports, the NYC Comptroller’s Office recognizes that individual schools may have made changes in the numbers of certified arts teachers, arts and cultural partnerships and arts spaces since the release of these reports.

Challenge” – a $500 million initiative to improve urban school districts.¹⁴

A year later, a new non-profit organization, The Center for Arts Education, was formed to carry out this mission. CAE received a $12 million, two-for-one matching grant from the Annenberg Challenge to “institutionalize arts instruction as part of the core curriculum and...[to] use the arts as a catalyst for whole-school change.”¹⁵ CAE performed this work in partnership with the NYC Board of Education (BOE), the Department of Cultural Affairs (DCA) and the United Federation of Teachers (UFT). Through a combination of separate City and grant funding, CAE also implemented arts initiatives focused on expanding parent engagement and career and professional development.

In 1997, the BOE created Project ARTS, the first per capita funding allocation for arts education since the 1970s.¹⁶ Project ARTS funds were targeted for direct instruction in core arts areas, related equipment, resource materials and supplies and partnerships with arts and cultural services.¹⁷ In Fiscal Year (FY) 1998, the City committed $25 million to Project ARTS.¹⁸ It then doubled funding the following year to $50 million, and Project ARTS hit its peak in FY 2000 and FY 2001 at $75 million: an allocation of $63 per student – creating, at a minimum, a baseline of equity for all students.¹⁹

During fiscal years 2002-2003, Project ARTS funding dropped to $52 million, bringing per pupil spending down to $47. In SY 2007-2008, the administration eliminated Project ARTS, folded funding for arts education into the general school budget and implemented ArtsCount, “a new set of strategies to enhance arts education in New York City public schools.”²⁰

ArtsCount was designed to build upon the DOE’s

Blueprint for Teaching and Learning in the Arts, which delineated benchmarks in the core arts areas. It was intended to create accountability for arts provision by incorporating arts metrics into a school’s performance for the first time.²¹

However, without money or accountability, ArtsCount proved ineffective at ensuring that schools provided students with a robust education in the arts. Indeed, the increasingly troubled state of arts education in the City’s public schools stemmed not just from the elimination of Project ARTS, but also from the DOE’s decision to omit the arts in its central accountability metric, the School Progress Report.²² These reports were part of a broader school accountability system that were “driven largely by the mandates of the federal No Child Left Behind Act, [which] placed a heavy emphasis on measuring accountability and achievement based on state assessments in just two key subject areas – English language arts [ELA] and math.”²³

As schools in New York City and elsewhere confronted high-stakes accountability standards that were tied directly to student performance on State ELA and math exams – among them, the possibility of school closure – principals were forced to make difficult choices about where to invest scarce resources. As a result, some opted to divert a portion of “supplemental arts funding” to non-arts related areas.

Absent meaningful public, school-level data on arts spending, there has been virtually no way for parents and others to discern how much funding individual schools may be devoting to certified arts teachers, arts supplies or other basic components of arts education. Evidence exists, however, of a progressive weakening of arts education in City schools over time.

In 2013, the Arts Advisory Committee to the City Panel for Educational Policy – established by the DOE in 2010 to assess and recommend reforms to improve arts education in the public schools – raised concerns about the loss of certified arts teachers across the school system between SY 2008-2009 and SY 2012-2013.

During this time, the system lost a total of 202 certified school-based arts teachers. High schools experienced the greatest impact, losing 234 teachers, followed by elementary schools (112) and middle schools (45). These numbers were offset by a gain of 190 teachers at school levels designated by the DOE as “Other.”²⁴ Some arts areas were more negatively impacted than others: the system lost 172 visual arts teachers and 73 music teachers from SY 2008 to SY 2013, while gaining 2 dance teachers and 41 theater teachers over the same period.²⁵

Further, DOE data indicate a 47 percent decline in schools’ spending on arts and cultural organizations that provide arts programming for students (from $25.7 million to $13.6 million), and an 84 percent decrease in spending on arts supplies, musical instruments and equipment (from $10.6 million to $1.7 million) between SY 2006-2007 and SY 2012-2013.²⁶ Additionally, 2,395 certified arts teachers served more than a million children across 1,700 schools in SY 2012-2013: 65 fewer teachers and 338 more schools than in SY 2006-2007.²⁷

Though New York City’s economic and fiscal health has rebounded from the depths of the Great Recession, public school principals continue to cite fiscal resources as the primary obstacle to providing arts education. Fifty percent of schools that responded to the DOE’s 2012-2013 Principal Satisfaction Survey listed fiscal resources as presenting a “significant challenge” to the school arts program, with use of space cited by 25 percent of principals as posing a similar challenge.²⁸

24 “Other” was not defined in the DOE data set. It may include: early childhood schools, K-Grade 8, K-Grade 12, secondary schools, etc.

The Arts Advisory Committee ultimately called for the DOE to reinstate a dedicated funding line for the arts, noting that arts education grew while the dedicated funding line (Project ARTS) was in place and has stagnated since it disappeared.²⁹

IV. FINDINGS: NYC SCHOOLS AND THEIR ABILITY TO PROVIDE ARTS PROGRAMMING AND SERVICES

The findings below are based on an analysis by the Comptroller’s Office of data from individual schools’ Annual Arts in Schools Reports for 2012-2013, which are based on the Annual Arts Education Survey that DOE sends to principals at all public schools each spring.³⁰ This survey asks a range of questions pertaining to a school’s provision of arts education to its students in areas including: certified arts teachers, arts and cultural partnerships, arts spaces in schools, student participation in arts courses, professional development activities for teachers and parent involvement with the arts.

In the spring of 2013, 1,545 schools (out of a total of 1,590) completed the DOE’s Arts Education Survey. The Office of the City Comptroller analyzed a sample of 1,487 schools³¹ including 603 elementary schools, 272 middle schools and 375 high schools. Remaining schools comprising the 1,487 dataset include 30 early childhood schools, 129 Kindergarten-Grade 8 schools, 3 Kindergarten-Grade 12 schools, and 75 secondary schools.

The Comptroller’s Office examined data in three areas that shed light on schools’ capacity to deliver arts services and programming to their students:

1. Whether schools employ full-time and/or part-time certified arts teachers;
2. Whether schools have formal partnerships with arts and cultural organizations; and
3. Whether schools dedicate rooms solely for instruction in core arts areas, including the visual arts, music, theater and dance.

29 Ibid

30 <http://schools.nyc.gov/offices/teachlearn/arts/artssurvey.html>

31 District 75 schools were not part of this report’s analysis.

The findings are accompanied by a series of maps that highlight neighborhoods in which schools confront significant challenges in providing arts programming and services to students. These neighborhoods – including the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn – have some of the highest poverty rates and lowest median incomes in the City.

New York State requires that students in grades 7-12 receive core arts instruction taught by certified teachers. However, 419 schools in New York City (28 percent) lack even one full-time certified arts teacher, including 20 percent of all high schools (76), 22 percent of all middle schools (59) and 38 percent of all elementary schools (232).³²

Furthermore, 306 schools in this study (20 percent) have neither a full- nor a part-time certified arts teacher, including 14 percent of all high schools (53), 13 percent of all middle schools (34) and 30 percent of all elementary schools (182).

According to the DOE’s Blueprint for Teaching and Learning in the Arts, Manual for School Leaders:

Full-time certified arts teachers are the backbone of an excellent arts education program. The arts should be taught by highly qualified personnel, consistent with all other subject areas. At the secondary level

32 State regulations on certified teachers in middle and high schools do not apply to elementary schools. At the elementary level, arts instruction can be provided by a general classroom teacher, certified arts instructor or a cultural partner. Other schools included in this total include: early childhood, K-8, K-12 and secondary schools.

(grades 7 through 12), only arts courses taught by licensed arts teachers are considered to be credit-bearing. All Title I schools are required by law to utilize qualified teachers in all subject areas.³³

Not only does the lack of certified arts teachers violate the DOE’s stated principles, it also runs afoul of State Education Law. All students in grades 7-8 must be provided instruction that, by the end of grade eight, enables them to achieve State intermediate learning standards, including at least one half unit of study in the visual arts and one half unit of study in music. In New York City, students can receive instruction in any two of the four recognized art forms.³⁴ State regulations also require that “districts shall employ teaching staff that are properly certified to teach assigned subjects and classes.”³⁵ Further, to secure a Regents diploma, students in grades 9-12 must have at least one “credit” of arts education which “must be taught by a certified teacher.”³⁶

Despite this clear and unambiguous mandate for certified arts teachers, many New York City schools are falling short.

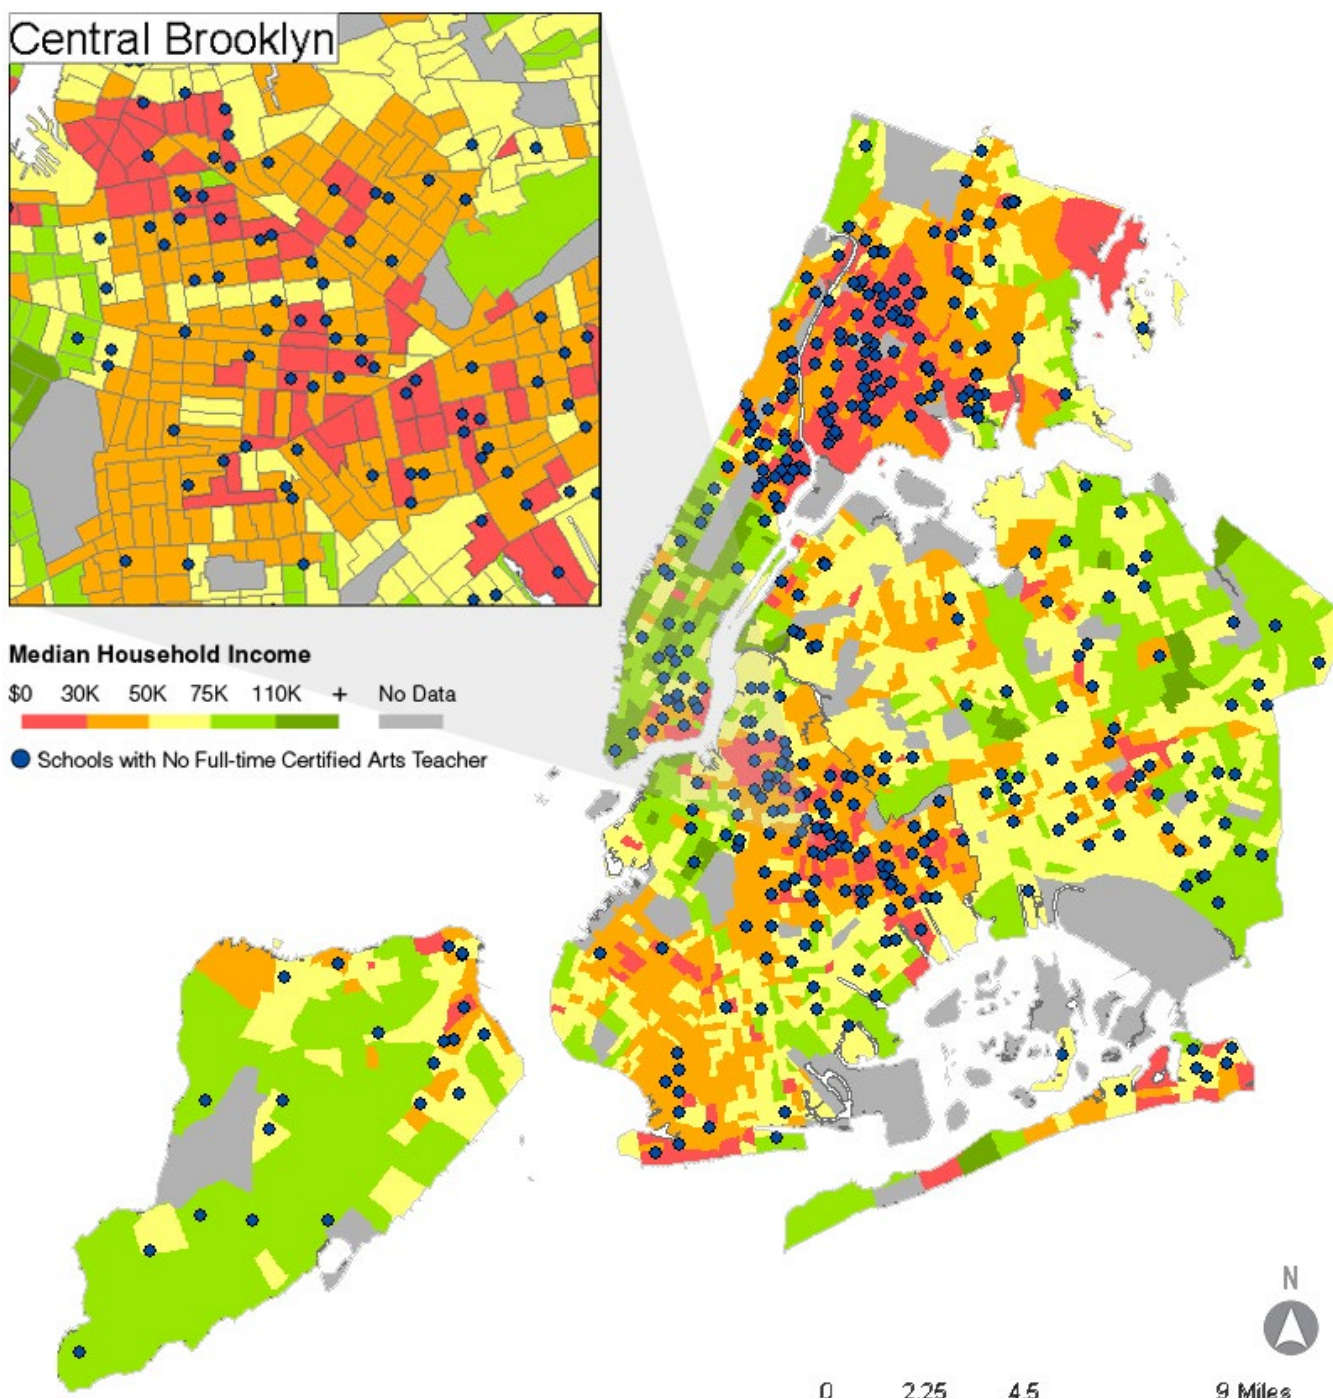

Map 1 shows the 419 New York City schools that lack even one full-time certified arts teacher, 28 percent of the total amount of schools in the sample.

Blue dots represent schools with no full-time certified arts teacher, while background colors reflect median income levels by census tract. Schools in the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn have the lowest median household incomes in the City (as measured by census tract) and are much more likely to lack a full-time arts instructor than schools in other neighborhoods.

All told, over 1 in 4 high schools and middle schools lack a full-time certified arts teacher.

See Appendix 1 on page 14 for a full listing of all city schools and their arts resources and programs.

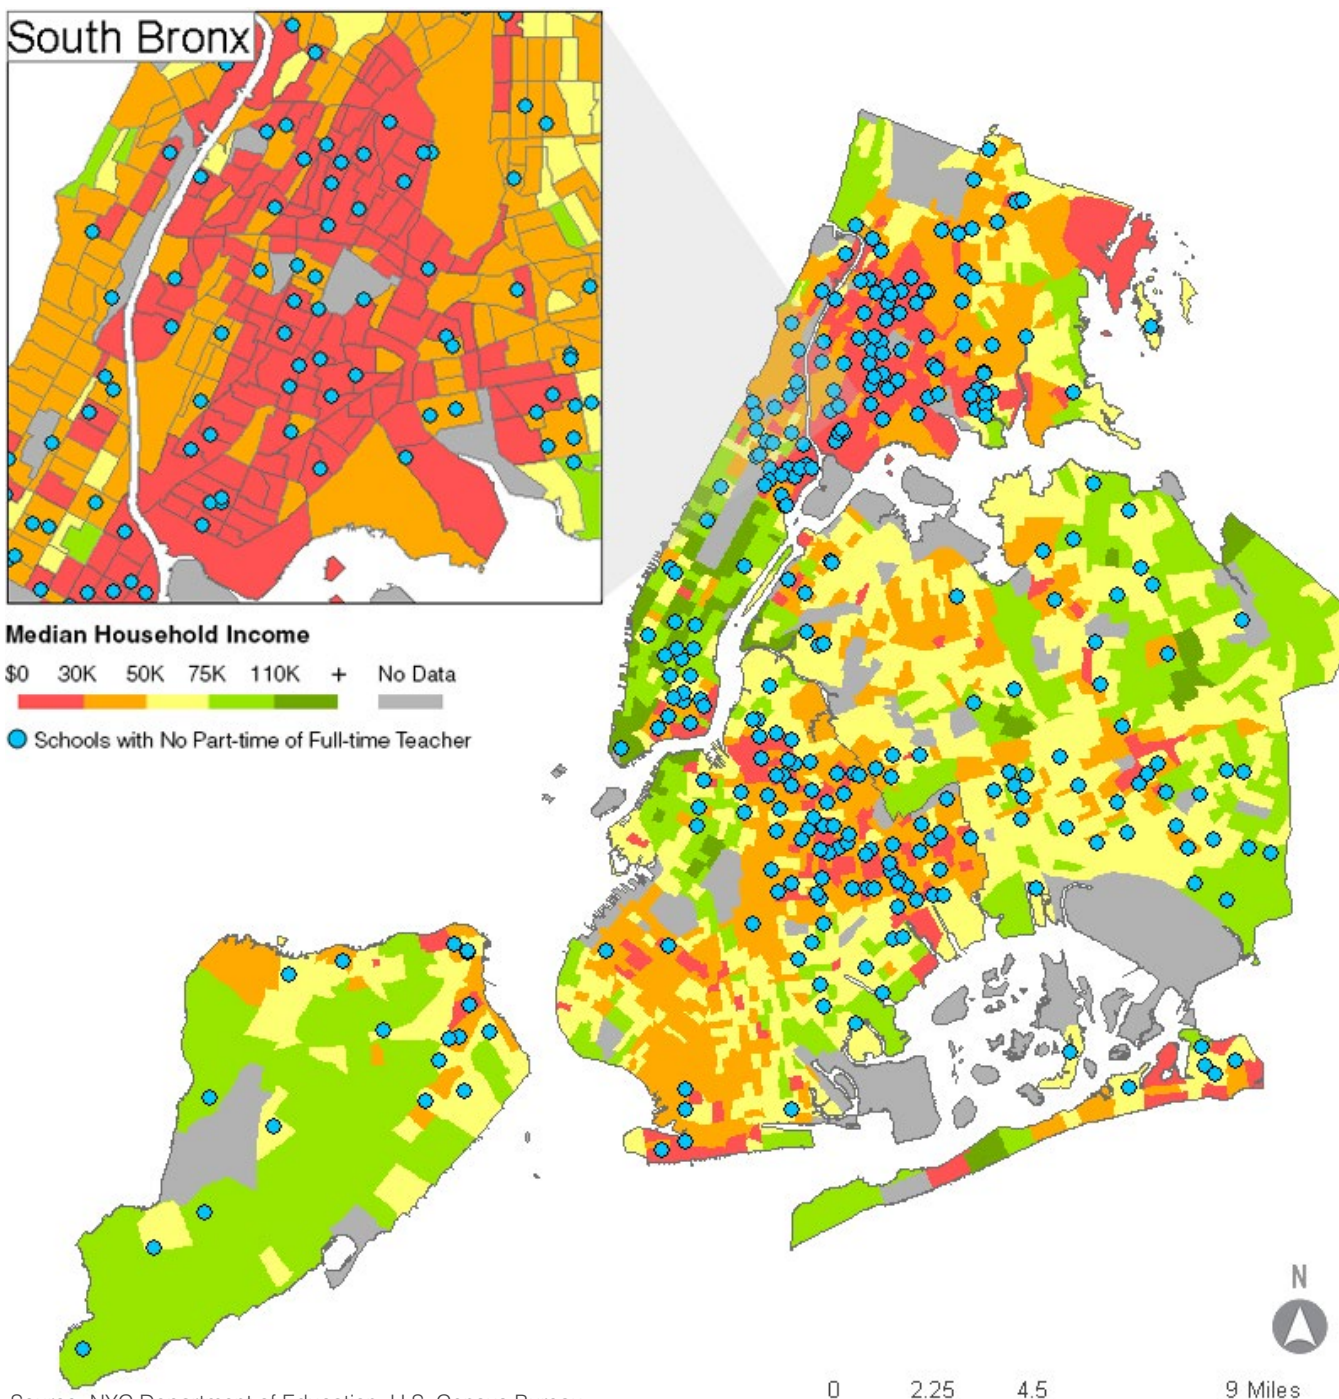

Map 2: New York City Schools with no Part-time or Full-time Certified Arts Teacher

Map 2 is a subset of Map 1, highlighting the 306 New York City schools that have neither a part-time nor a full-time certified arts teacher – 1 in 5 schools in this sample.

A majority of schools without part- or full-time certified arts teachers – 182 – are elementary schools. In addition, 34 middle schools and 53 high schools have neither part-time nor full-time certified arts teachers. The remaining schools without part-time or full-time certified arts teachers include early childhood schools, K-Grade 8, K-Grade 12, and secondary schools.

While schools in neighborhoods across the five boroughs lack certified art teachers, schools in the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn are once again disproportionately affected. More than 42 percent of schools that lack either a full-time or part-time certified arts teacher are located in these neighborhoods.

Map 3: New York City Schools with no Arts or Cultural Partnerships

In Map 3, black dots represent schools with no arts or cultural partnerships, while background colors reflect median income levels by census tract.

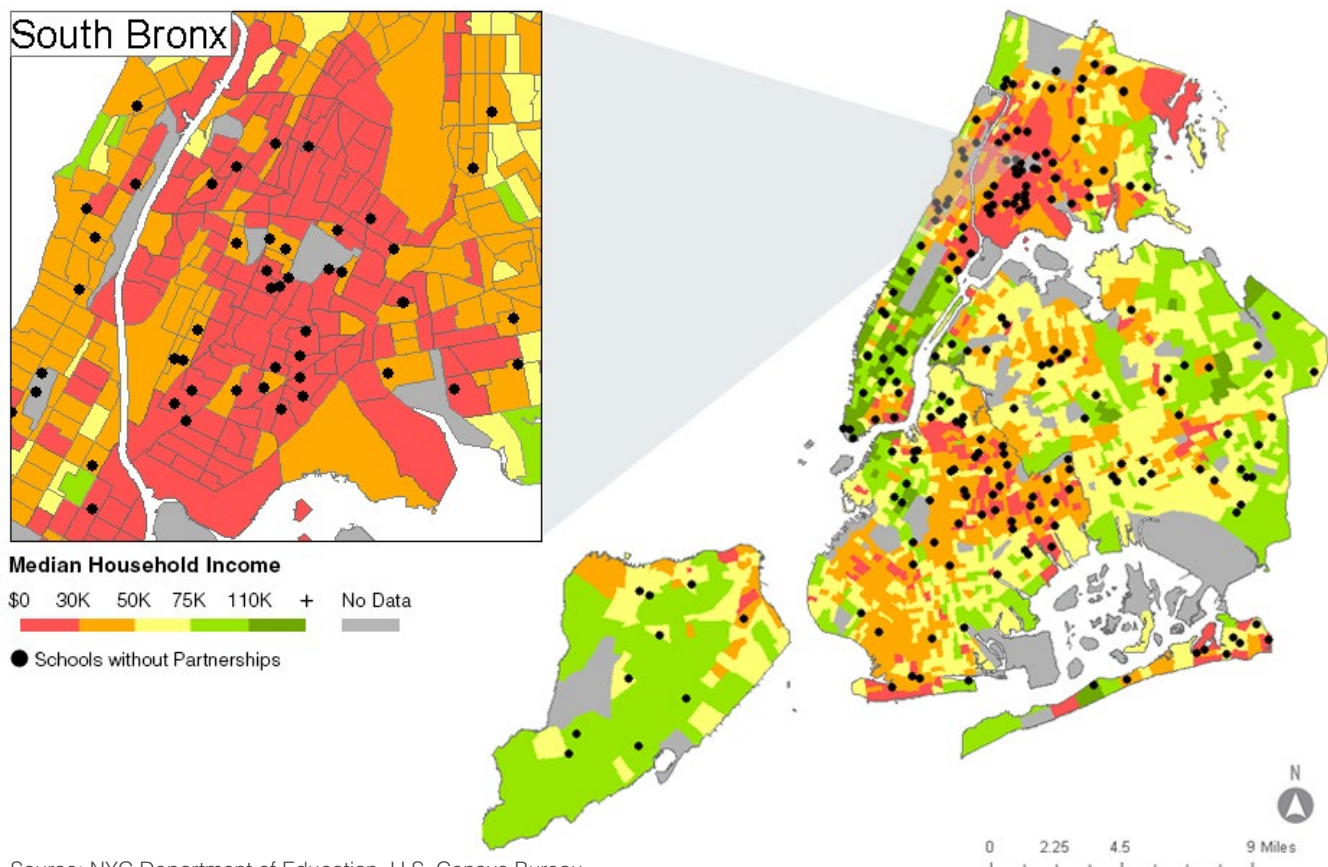

25 percent of high schools, 24 percent of middle schools and 9 percent of elementary schools in New York City lack partnerships with arts and cultural organizations.

The DOE’s Blueprint for Teaching and Learning in the Arts, Manual for School Leaders, asserts that partnerships with arts and cultural organizations “play a vital role in rounding out the delivery of arts education, representing a range of expertise that can complement the skills and training of...in-school staff.” Further, “Students should have multiple opportunities every year to leave the school building and visit the world-class museums, concert halls, theaters, and dance performance venues that New York City has to offer.”³⁷

Despite the DOE’s recognition of the importance of partnerships with arts and cultural organizations, thousands of students in hundreds of schools across the City lack access to the vital and vibrant opportunities these collaborations bring. Arts and cultural organizations can play a critical role in supporting and building-out arts instruction and programming in schools. These partnerships also offer key opportunities to introduce students to a wide array of careers in the arts and creative sector. Pairing schools with arts and cultural organizations should be more than merely an ambition, it should be a priority.

A total of 244 New York City schools (16.4 percent of this sample) report having no arts or cultural partnerships. Many schools lacking these partnerships are clustered in lower-income neighborhoods, including the South Bronx (49 schools) and Central Brooklyn (37 schools).

Blue dots on the map represent schools that have no arts or cultural partnerships and no full-time certified arts teacher. Background colors on the map reflect the median household income of that area. Of these schools, nearly half are located in the South Bronx (15) and Central Brooklyn (18).

Of the 22 Bronx schools and 21 Brooklyn schools that have no arts or cultural organization partnerships and no certified arts teacher, 68 percent are in the South Bronx and 86 percent are in Central Brooklyn, respectively.

Map 5: New York City Schools with no Dedicated Arts Rooms

As shown in Map 5, 10 percent of New York City schools (150 in total) report having no dedicated arts rooms.

Historically flawed formulas and assessments of school building space in DOE documents, including the Enrollment, Capacity and Utilization Report (also known as the “Blue Book”³⁸) highlight the need for clearer information on rooms dedicated specifically for instruction in the arts.³⁹

The DOE’s Blueprint for Teaching and Learning in the Arts, Manual for School Leaders states that: “Whenever possible, dedicated rooms should be provided for arts instruction. This means that the room used for instruction in an arts discipline is used only for that purpose, and is not shared or multi-purpose space.”⁴⁰

38 In 2014 the DOE convened a new working group – of which the Comptroller’s Office is a participating member – that is charged with assessing and recommending reforms to the Blue Book.

New York City public schools face longstanding space constraints, well-documented in three “Crowded Out” reports and a 2010 assessment of Manhattan school co-locations, released by Scott M. Stringer in his former capacity as Manhattan Borough President. The data below shows some of the results of the City’s historic failure to adequately plan for arts space in our schools.

This data shows that schools in Central Brooklyn and South Bronx (see insert) – neighborhoods with some of the lowest median household incomes in the City – are more likely than schools in other neighborhoods to lack dedicated arts spaces.

In sum, more than one in three of all City schools that do not have dedicated arts rooms are located in the South Bronx and Central Brooklyn.

Source: NYC Department of Education, U.S. Census Bureau

Analysis of Data on Certified Arts Teachers, Arts and Cultural Partnerships and Dedicated Arts Rooms, by School Level

- 20.3 percent of high schools lack even one full-time certified arts teacher, compared to 21.6 percent of middle schools and 38.4 percent of elementary schools.
- 14.1 percent of high schools have neither a part-time nor full-time certified arts teacher, compared to 12.5 percent of middle schools and 30.1 percent of elementary schools.
- 25.3 percent of high schools lack partnerships with arts or cultural organizations, compared to 24.2 percent of middle schools, and 9 percent of elementary schools.
- 10.4 percent of high schools lack a dedicated art room, compared to 8.1 percent of middle schools and 11.2 percent of elementary schools.

Under a new administration, tremendous potential exists for a revival of arts education in the City’s public schools, and for every child to have equitable access to arts and cultural opportunities that connect them more fully to the people and world around them. A series of clear steps will help move us towards that goal.

V. RECOMMENDATIONS

- Promote strategies that build schools’ capacity to have at least one certified arts teacher on staff. Every elementary, middle and high school should have at least one certified arts teacher, and more where appropriate. DOE should work with schools serving grades 7-12 to comply with State mandates for certified arts teachers. Where feasible, small schools should be encouraged to share arts teachers.
 - Build schools’ capacity to provide a robust arts education by expanding outreach to potential cultural partners. The DOE should provide additional supports to schools lacking cultural partnerships, including helping to connect and pair them with arts and cultural organizations. The DOE currently hosts one “Cultural Fair” each year to encourage arts and cultural organizations to partner with city schools. This outreach should be expanded to include similar fairs in all five boroughs at least once a year.
 - Adopt a “no-net loss” of space policy as part of larger effort to increase arts rooms and to ensure that every school has places equipped for the arts. Although finding or creating new space for dedicated arts rooms in New York City will always be a challenge, the DOE should ensure that there is “no-net loss” of arts rooms when district schools are co-located with other district or charter schools. Toward that end, Educational Impact Statements – which the DOE releases when proposing school phase outs, co-locations, re-sitings and grade reconfigurations – should clearly specify how DOE will preserve existing dedicated arts rooms. Further, future school planning and construction should include dedicated arts spaces.
 - Ensure adequate funding to support quality arts education at all city schools. The DOE should prioritize additional support for arts education in schools that have yet to meet at least the minimum standards set by the City and State, and break out arts spending in its budget so the public can see how much is being spent on a school-by-school basis.
- Broaden the DOE accountability framework, including School Progress Reports, to include arts education. As part of a larger review of School Progress Reports, the DOE should include information in every school profile about certified arts teachers, partnerships with arts and cultural organizations, dedicated arts rooms and compliance with State mandates in arts instruction. Parents should know what arts education resources are available to children at every school as this information reflects school priorities and curriculum offerings.

VI. APPENDIX

New York State and New York City Arts Education Requirement Guidelines⁴¹

PRE-K-Kindergarten: Each such school operating a pre-kindergarten or kindergarten program shall establish and provide an educational program based on and adapted to the ages, interests, and needs of the children. Learning activities in such programs shall include dramatic play, creative art, and music activities.

GRADES 1-3: In grades 1 through 3, all students shall receive instruction that is designed to facilitate their attainment of the State elementary learning standards in the arts, including dance, music, theater, and visual arts.

Twenty percent of the weekly time spent in school should be allocated to dance, music, theatre, and visual arts. In New York City, this is the equivalent of approximately 186 hours throughout the entire school year equally allocated between dance, music, theater, and visual arts.

GRADES 4-6: In grades 4 through 6, all students shall receive instruction that is designed to facilitate their attainment of the State elementary learning standards in the arts, including dance, music, theater, and visual arts. Ten percent of the weekly time spent in school should be allocated to dance, music, theater, and visual arts. In New York City, this is the equivalent of approximately 93 hours throughout the entire school year equally allocated between dance, music, theater, and visual arts.

GRADES 7-8: All students shall be provided instruction designed to enable them to achieve, by the end of grade 8, State intermediate learning standards in the arts, including one-half unit of study in the visual arts, and one half unit of study in music. In New York City, one-half unit is the equivalent of approximately 55 hours of instruction by a licensed arts teacher and may be offered in dance, music, theater or visual arts.

GRADES 9-12: New York State Graduation requirements for the arts include one unit (one year) in visual arts and/or music, dance, or theater. In New York City, one unit of credit is the equivalent of approximately 108 hours of instruction by a licensed arts teacher.

Availability of Arts Sequences NYSED Requirement: High schools have the option of fulfilling the graduation requirement through either ½ unit of credit (one semester each) in both visual arts and music, or one unit of credit (one year) in one of the four arts forms.

All public school districts shall offer students the opportunity to complete a three- or five-unit sequence in the arts (art, music, dance or theater).

Notes on the Data

The New York City Comptroller's Office analyzed a sample of 1,487 schools from the Department of Education's broader dataset of 1,545 schools that responded to the 2012-2013 Arts in Education Survey. Of the 1,487 schools in this sample, 603 are elementary schools, 272 are middle schools and 375 are high schools. Remaining schools comprising the 1,487 dataset include 30 early childhood schools, 129 Kindergarten-Grade 8 schools, 3 Kindergarten-Grade 12 schools and 75 secondary schools. Fifty-eight District 75 schools were not part of this report's analysis. Charter schools, which were not part of DOE's data set, are also not part of this report's tabulations.

The borough with the greatest number of schools represented in this sample is Brooklyn, with 453, followed by the Bronx (353) and Queens (318). Boroughs with the fewest number of schools in this sample are Manhattan (296) and Staten Island (67).

For the purpose of this report's analysis, the Office of the New York City Comptroller analyzed data from individual schools' 2012-2013 Annual Arts in Schools Reports, located online.
